INSANITY.

An estimate of the number of insane persons in the United States, made by Dr. C. L. Dana of New York, places the total at 91,997. The United States census makes a smaller number, but it has been shown that deductions in the latter are required from the methods of classification employed by the census bureau. One striking fact presents itself, namely, that while our whole population increased in the decade 1870 to 1880 about 26 per cent, the insane population increased apparently over 100 per cent. But this apparent increase is due largely to the fact that the insane are being accumulated in asylums and that the census of 1870 was very incomplete as regards this tendency. Still there is evidence that the increase of the ratio of insanity in our country is proportional, but not quite so much below that of many European countries. In the older portions of our country, where the mental and industrial activity is greatest, the ratio is largest, with the exception of the Pacific states, where special causes produce almost as high a ratio as in any part of the United States.

For illustration, we find the ratio of insane population to entire population, to be, in the New England states, 1 to 557; in the Middle states, 1 to 446; in the Western states, 1 to 570; in the Southern states, 1 to 780; and in the Pacific states, 1 to 363. In England it is not far from 1 to 350. It is not possible to say yet whether the ratio of insanity in America will be less than it is in Europe. We shall not know, till the many agencies of the complex civilization to be worked out here have more fully developed their results.

In 1880 there were 74 asylums for the insane in the United States. The annual cost per patient in 55 of these was $193 44. A careful estimate of the amount of money invested in asylums for the insane in our states and territories makes a total of $40,000,000.

Dr. Nathan Allen of Massachusetts, who has given the subject special study, insists that the erection of large and expensive buildings is a great mistake. The magnitude of the thing has led to extravagance. Instead of thousands, millions have been expended in some instances for the mere building, requiring the expenditure of three or four thousand dollars for the accommodation of each individual patient. This has led to unnecessarily large and expensive provision for officers. Again, it has been found that these large establishments are very difficult for efficient administration. Suitable persons cannot be found to take care of them without having too many head officers. In the multiplicity of numbers there is found to be far greater liability to friction and complaint, and there cannot be found that individual responsibility and fidelity in watchfulness and discipline that are always so necessary.

Again, there is objection to the congregation of so large a number of diseased persons. The primary object of hospital treatment is cure, and in the course pursued with reference to the insane this matter of cure is too often lost sight of. In the great crowd and constant changes individuality and personality are lost, and it is impossible to follow up the treatment of every single patient as it should be. In the larger hospitals it has been found that the ratio of cures is not so high as in the smaller ones. This in fact is only to be expected, for all sick people exercise an unwholesome influence upon their surroundings, and the congregation of large numbers of sick must aggravate the general malady. When disordered minds come much in contact with other disordered minds the effect can hardly be other than to increase the derangement.

It is argued, therefore, that hospitals for the insane should be smaller than they now are usually built, and confined exclusively to the work of cure. When patients have passed into the chronic state of the disease, or are considered incurable, they should be provided for in different establishments. It is estimated that in hospitals managed expressly for curative treatment there would be a larger per cent. of the patients cured, and a smaller per cent. become dependents for life. It is the feature of chronic insanity in the present system that makes the expense of supporting the insane so great and burdensome both to the state and to individuals.

Insanity has increased so rapidly among us, and is so sure to increase further, that any look into the subject must be far from encouraging. But it is well to make the problem as definite as possible, and to look fairly at its results, even if it shall present no hopeful features. This country will be obliged to support an insane population in about the ratio of one to four hundred of the entire population, and in some states perhaps one to three hundred. Such being the case, prevention of insanity is a branch of the subject which must at some time engage the public and legislative attention.

H. W. C.

OUR WHEAT PRODUCTION

In the statistics of wheat production in the United States, as furnished by the reports of the last census, we have a variety of useful and interesting information for all who are engaged in the production or sale of that cereal. These reports moreover furnish valuable lessons in agricultural economy, and illustrate in several ways the progressive tendency of this great branch of agriculture. The area of wheat grown in 1879, the year on which our latest reports are based, was thirty-seven millions of acres, being more than double the area grown in 1864, and also more than double that grown in France at the present time. During each same period the population of the country has increased but one-half as much. The increase over the growth of population is attributed largely to the increase in the character of agricultural machinery for cultivating the soil and for harvesting the crops. It is well illustrated by a comparison of the ratio of our wheat production with the population of the country, which also shows that it extends through a long period with accelerating movement. For example, the average product per capita in 1849 was 4 1-5 bushels, in 1859 it was 5⅞, in 1869 it was 7.28, while in 1879 it was 9.2 bushels. During the thirty years embraced by these figures, notwithstanding the increase of over 100 per cent. of our population, the supply of wheat for each person has been more than doubled. It is this increase which enables this country to export from thirty three per cent. to forty per cent. of every crop, so that even in the years when our crop was shortest we have had enough for our own consumption, and a reasonable amount for export. And yet this increase is by no means general throughout the country, as not a single state of the east and south produced over eight bushels per capita, while the New England states averaged but about one-third of a bushel, which would be something less than one month's supply. To bring up the average some of the states must therefore have produced largely in excess. Thus Minnesota produced 44 bushels per capita, Oregon 42, California 31, Nebraska 31, Washington territory 26, Indiana 24, Michigan 22, Dakota 21, Wisconsin 19, Kansas, Illinois and Idaho each 15, Ohio 14 and Missouri 12 bushels. The Ohio valley produced at not one-half more than the northwest from the same area, 10,000,000 acres. Thus less than one third of the states and two of the territories produce a surplus, and a majority of the states do not raise enough for their own consumption.

The advantages of these and the other statistics on the same subject, also bound together with related accuracy even in regard to the growing crops, are found in the fact that they tend to check the exaggeration of speculators as to crop prospects; they offer a reliable basis for prices, which should always be governed by the law of supply and demand, letting the farmer when to sell to the best advantage; they estimate surplus for export, a very important factor in determining values, and enable the farmer to discount the storm and frost by the latter's force, for the purpose of depressing prices. The ordinary statistics of our census reports are not available for the first purpose because of the inaccuracy of their returns, and because they were not issued promptly enough to serve as a guide to the producer. It is illustrative of these statements by the Department of Agriculture, which is regularly reported and published from the most reliable data, and which the press of the country circulates all the year throughout. A careful reading of these reports will prove of great advantage to the farmer, enabling him to market his product to the best advantage, and to judge for himself as to the future prices of any particular crop.

INTENTIONS OF OUR FOES.

In the November number of the North American Review Prince Bismarck declares that he will not take part in the Berlin Congress of Europe, but will give a full display of his views, coming to us, of course, through the London Times. The above quotation is from the Prince's article in question.
